Chapter 1 by R

She was standing in the woods, alone, and that was never a sign of anything good. He had spent seven years now, hunting monsters, and mysteriously beautiful women were never to be trusted.

He stepped carefully towards her, arm reaching towards the iron sword at his side. This felt like faerie business to him, and iron would work better than bullets if that were the case. He walked towards her with an open smile and wary eyes.

"What's a woman as pretty as you doing in a place like this?" He asked with a flirtatious tone. The woman grinned at him earnestly.

"I'm looking for my friends." She said, tugging on her leather jacket. "We were investigating some strange occurrences here in the woods - you know how it is, don't you." She was eyeing his sword with a grin.

"Well, yeah." He said, surprised. "I almost mistook you for some dryad or a goddess, you're just that beautiful." He admitted, still flirting. "You wouldn't happen to know what domain this is, would you?"

and this was also flirting so

"You don't know?" The woman asked, laughing cheerfully. "You're just outside of Tyria, my friend. There aren't too many monsters here."

"Tyria?" He asked, confused. "I've never heard of this place before, and I've done a lot of wandering." He neglected to mention this was why he was lost in the woods and not with his friends in the city, drinking beer and celebrating their latest hunt. It wasn't his fault he had no sense of directions!

"I suppose I could tell you the story." The woman decided. "There's this Huntress who has a smallclave of warriors, one I wish I could be a part of. They protect the city of Byrsa from the monsters, and they have for quite some time. Her name is Dido, and she has quite an interesting story, to be honest with you."

He leaned in a little, interested. "Really? I would love to hear the story!" He said.
